Dear Honorable Judge Lewis and Honorable Judge Hayes:

I have known Kevin Marsh for 42 years and he is not only a close friend, he is my best friend. We met while we both worked at Deloitte, Haskins & Sells (now Deloitte & Touche) in 1979. I subsequently went on to work for the U. S. Securities and Exchange Commission in Washington, D.C. and Kevin subsequently went to work for SCE&G as Controller. When an appropriate position arose, Kevin offered me a job in his organization and I gladly accepted the opportunity to come home to Columbia and to have the privilege of once again working with Kevin. A bonus of our relationship is that our spouses are also close friends.

One of Kevin's qualities is that he is a people person. He connects with people and is genuine about it. A great example of this was evident when he attained a senior leadership role in SCANA. Whereas prior senior officers in this role rarely bothered to go into the field and meet front-line employees, Kevin often went to the field, interacted with many front-line employees of all levels, learned their roles, needs and issues, and connected with them. He was known to be firm yet fair. He respected all of SCANA's employees and showed it and they loved him for it.

Kevin is also a person of humor, laughs easily and has a quick wit. I have enjoyed many laughs with him over the years. He is very self-deprecating and didn't let becoming a senior officer, and then CEO, go to his head. A great illustration occurred when he hired a very tall administrative assistant. On her first day, Kevin called her into his office, pulled out a stool, stood on it, and told his new secretary that he wanted to make sure they talked "eye to eye" to understand each other. Kevin often joked about his height in large group employee settings and employees appreciated his wit.

Although Kevin likes to joke around, he is a very caring person. He cared deeply about his employees. When an employee was killed in a tragic workplace accident, Kevin mourned with the family and shared with me how much that had affected him. He followed up with actions to improve safety in our company and our company became a leader in workplace safety among our peers.

Another illustration of caring was Kevin and Sue helping a young single Black mom get back on her feet. They rented an apartment for her, furnished it, bought her a car, got her a job, and ensured she had the funds to stay afloat until her income from the job could provide for her needs.

Once, when he and I were coming back from lunch, we saw a car stranded in traffic on a very busy downtown highway. Kevin immediately pulled into the nearest parking lot he could find and hot-footed it across the highway to help. Although I was very worried about being hit by cars, Kevin calmly took charge and, using his automotive skills, was able to get the stranded car safely off the road. A lot of people, myself included, would have driven by and said a prayer for the stranded driver, but that isn't Kevin's way. He cares enough to take action.

An almost humorous example of caring that I want to share was when Kevin and Sue joined a new church. Kevin approached the minister after the service and inquired about the Benevolence Fund. The minister, somewhat embarrassed, replied that they couldn't help Kevin at this time since the Fund didn't have much in it. Kevin was quick to reassure him that, rather than needing funds, he wanted to make a significant contribution to the Fund.

Kevin makes it a tradition each Christmas season to randomly pick out servers at different restaurants to give very large tips. And when the Epworth Children's Home needed a new van, Kevin donated one to them. Kevin has always viewed himself as blessed in life and he wants to pass that blessing on to others. As he told me, it makes him feel good to help others.

Kevin always strives to do the right thing. I have seen many examples of that over the years. One, in particular, comes to mind. When Kevin became CEO of SCANA, one of his first actions was to designate Martin Luther King's birthday as a company holiday because, as he told me, it was "the right thing to do."

Many people in the Company, including me, viewed Kevin as one of the smartest people they knew. Over and over again, when faced with seemingly impossible situations, Kevin could see a path through whereas none of his staff could. In addition, he has a phenomenal memory and in any given situation, can recall long ago facts and detail that always prove right when checked. And he is skilled in more than just financial affairs. He knows how to work on both houses and cars. When we moved back to Columbia and bought a house, he came over and made electrical changes that we needed and put up garage door openers and window blinds. He constantly shows that he is a helper and a talented one at that. Even when his role at SCANA required an inordinate amount of his time, he still used what little available personal time he had remaining to help and serve others.

Many years ago, when Kevin and I were just starting out, we had to conserve funds by helping each other move into apartments or houses. Once, in the process of a move during icy conditions, we lost control of the loaded hand truck and inadvertently damaged a brand new car in the apartment complex parking lot. Although no one had seen our accident, he and I were quick to agree that we needed to tell the owner, which we did. The integrity that he demonstrated then has not changed over the years.

He is a man of honesty and integrity, caring and compassion, humor, kindness and consideration, and genuineness. These values, which we both hold so dear, have cemented our relationship these many years.

My wife and I love Kevin and Sue and we will always be there for them, especially now. I hope and pray that this letter has given you both some further insight into this very good man.

Respectfully,
